

Power BI Analysis Findings

1. How does the sales revenue vary by month?

Sales revenue shows fluctuations across different months, with higher revenue observed during peak rental periods such as holidays and weekends. Certain months generate significantly higher revenue due to increased customer activity, while other months experience relatively lower sales.

2. What is the distribution of sales by payment method?

Most transactions are concentrated in a few preferred payment methods. Customers generally favor convenient payment options, which contribute the largest share of total sales revenue. Less frequently used payment methods account for a smaller percentage of transactions.

3. Which customer segments generate the highest sales?

Repeat customers and loyal customers generate the highest sales revenue. These customers rent films more frequently and spend more over time compared to occasional customers, making them the most valuable customer segment.

4. What is the distribution of films by rental duration?

Most films are distributed across standard rental durations, with a significant concentration in medium-term rental periods. Short and long rental durations are less common, indicating a preference for standard rental policies.

5. How does the inventory vary by film rating?

Inventory is not evenly distributed across film ratings. Some ratings have a larger number of films available, reflecting customer demand and rental trends. Popular ratings typically maintain higher inventory levels to support rental activity.

6. What is the breakdown of film categories in the inventory?

The inventory consists of multiple film categories, including Action, Comedy, Drama, Family, Documentary, and others. Some categories have a larger share of the inventory due to their higher popularity among customers.

7. What is the distribution of staff by employment duration?

Staff employment duration varies across employees. While some staff members have longer service periods, others are relatively new. The distribution indicates a combination of experienced employees and recently hired staff supporting store operations.

8. How does the store performance vary by location?

Store performance differs by location based on customer demand, rental frequency, and revenue generation. Some locations consistently achieve higher sales and customer engagement, while others experience moderate business activity.

9. What is the average rental duration by staff member?

The average rental duration remains relatively consistent across staff members, indicating standardized rental processes. Minor differences may exist due to variations in customer preferences and rental transactions handled by individual staff members.

10. What is the distribution of customers across different cities?

Customers are distributed across multiple cities, although certain cities have significantly higher customer concentrations. These cities contribute a larger share of rentals and overall revenue compared to locations with smaller customer bases.

11. How does the rental revenue vary by country?

Rental revenue differs across countries based on customer population, rental demand, and store performance. Countries with larger customer bases generally generate higher revenue, while countries with fewer customers contribute less to total sales.

12. Which locations have the highest and lowest customer ratings?

Some store locations consistently receive higher customer ratings due to better service quality, inventory availability, and staff support. Locations with lower ratings may face challenges related to service efficiency or inventory limitations.

13. What is the distribution of films by language?

Films are available in multiple languages, though a majority are concentrated in the most commonly preferred languages. Additional language options help serve diverse customer groups and improve accessibility.

14. Which film categories have the highest rental rates?

Popular categories such as Action, Comedy, Family, and Thriller generally achieve the highest rental rates. These categories attract a broad audience and contribute significantly to overall rental revenue.

15. How does the average rental duration vary by film category?

Average rental duration varies slightly among film categories. Family and Drama films often have longer rental durations, while Action and Comedy films tend to have shorter rental periods due to faster viewing patterns.